Double garage door: Pros and Cons

The garage is an important part of any house. It has multiple uses and is one of the most regularly used areas. A garage that fulfils all of your family's requirements is a great asset to have. Most homes today are constructed with garages included, and these days a double garage is ideal for most homes because people generally have more than one car. The extra space also comes in handy because can be used as a storage option as well as a recreational area with a pool or foosball table. No matter whether you are using the garage for cars or recreation, your garage usually requires a double garage door. These doors are available in various types with different materials being used as well as diverse modes of functioning.

You can get a double garage door made of steel, wood or aluminium depending on your choice. Bear in mind that such a door performs many important roles. It not only protects your cars from unforgiving weather but also provides security to your house against burglars and trespassers. Whether you choose a steel garage door or a wooden one, it is entirely up to you. The steel garage door is the most common owing to its little cost and relatively low upkeep. There is limited choice of colours however and you might not be able to find a double garage door that goes with the rest of your home.

On the other hand, a wooden double garage door is costly but allows you greater freedom in choosing colours and type of wood. Such garage doors are potentially more aesthetically pleasing. In recent times steel double garage door manufactures have sought to combat this characteristic by offering various wood textured designs.

The mode of operation of the double garage door is of vital importance. Traditional garage doors use either a spring mechanism or come with rolling wheels. The biggest advantage with such systems is affordability. A garage door that works under these principles is very easy to install and operate. The roller garage door takes up very little space as it can be rolled up thus leaving ample space for the stuff the garage is supposed to contain.

In this increasingly technology driven world, an automatic double garage door has also been introduced. While being relatively expensive than its manual counterpart, the automatic garage door is a useful innovation. This variety of a garage doors is less prone to problems. The major benefit this brings is the increase level of security and safety. An automatic garage door often comes with password protection and other security features.

Ultimately the double garage door you choose will depend upon your particular requirements and budget. Try and figure out what works best for you and your family and do not be fooled by marketing gimmicks. Remember that at the end of the day whatever type of double garage door you buy; regular maintenance will have to be performed in order to ensure smooth functioning over a long period.
